Dà chànan, dà shaoghal, iomadh cothrom!

Antonella Sorace is professor of Developmental Linguistics at the University of Edinburgh. She is a world leading authority in the field of bilingual language development, where she is particularly well known for her studies of exceptionally talented (“near-native”) adult second language speakers; for her research on the changes (“attrition”) that take place in the native language of advanced second language speakers; for her investigation of bilingual language acquisition in early and late childhood, and of the effects of early bilingualism on general cognition. She is committed to disseminating the findings of research on bilingualism outside academia: for this purpose she has created the information and consultancy service Bilingualism Matters.
